Who joins Princeton's eating clubs? Breaking down eating club trends.

These clubs have historically been a large part of Princeton's social scene, with approximately three-quarters of Princeton seniors reporting they have paid dues to at least one eating club during their undergraduate career.

The Daily Princetonian broke down the senior respondents aggregated from the 2022, 2023, and 2024 senior surveys. Every club had a sample size of at least 45 students, with five clubs having a sample size of at least 150 over the three years.

Drinking Frequency by Eating Club

Average drinking frequency by club, scaled from 0 (Never) to 7 (Daily).

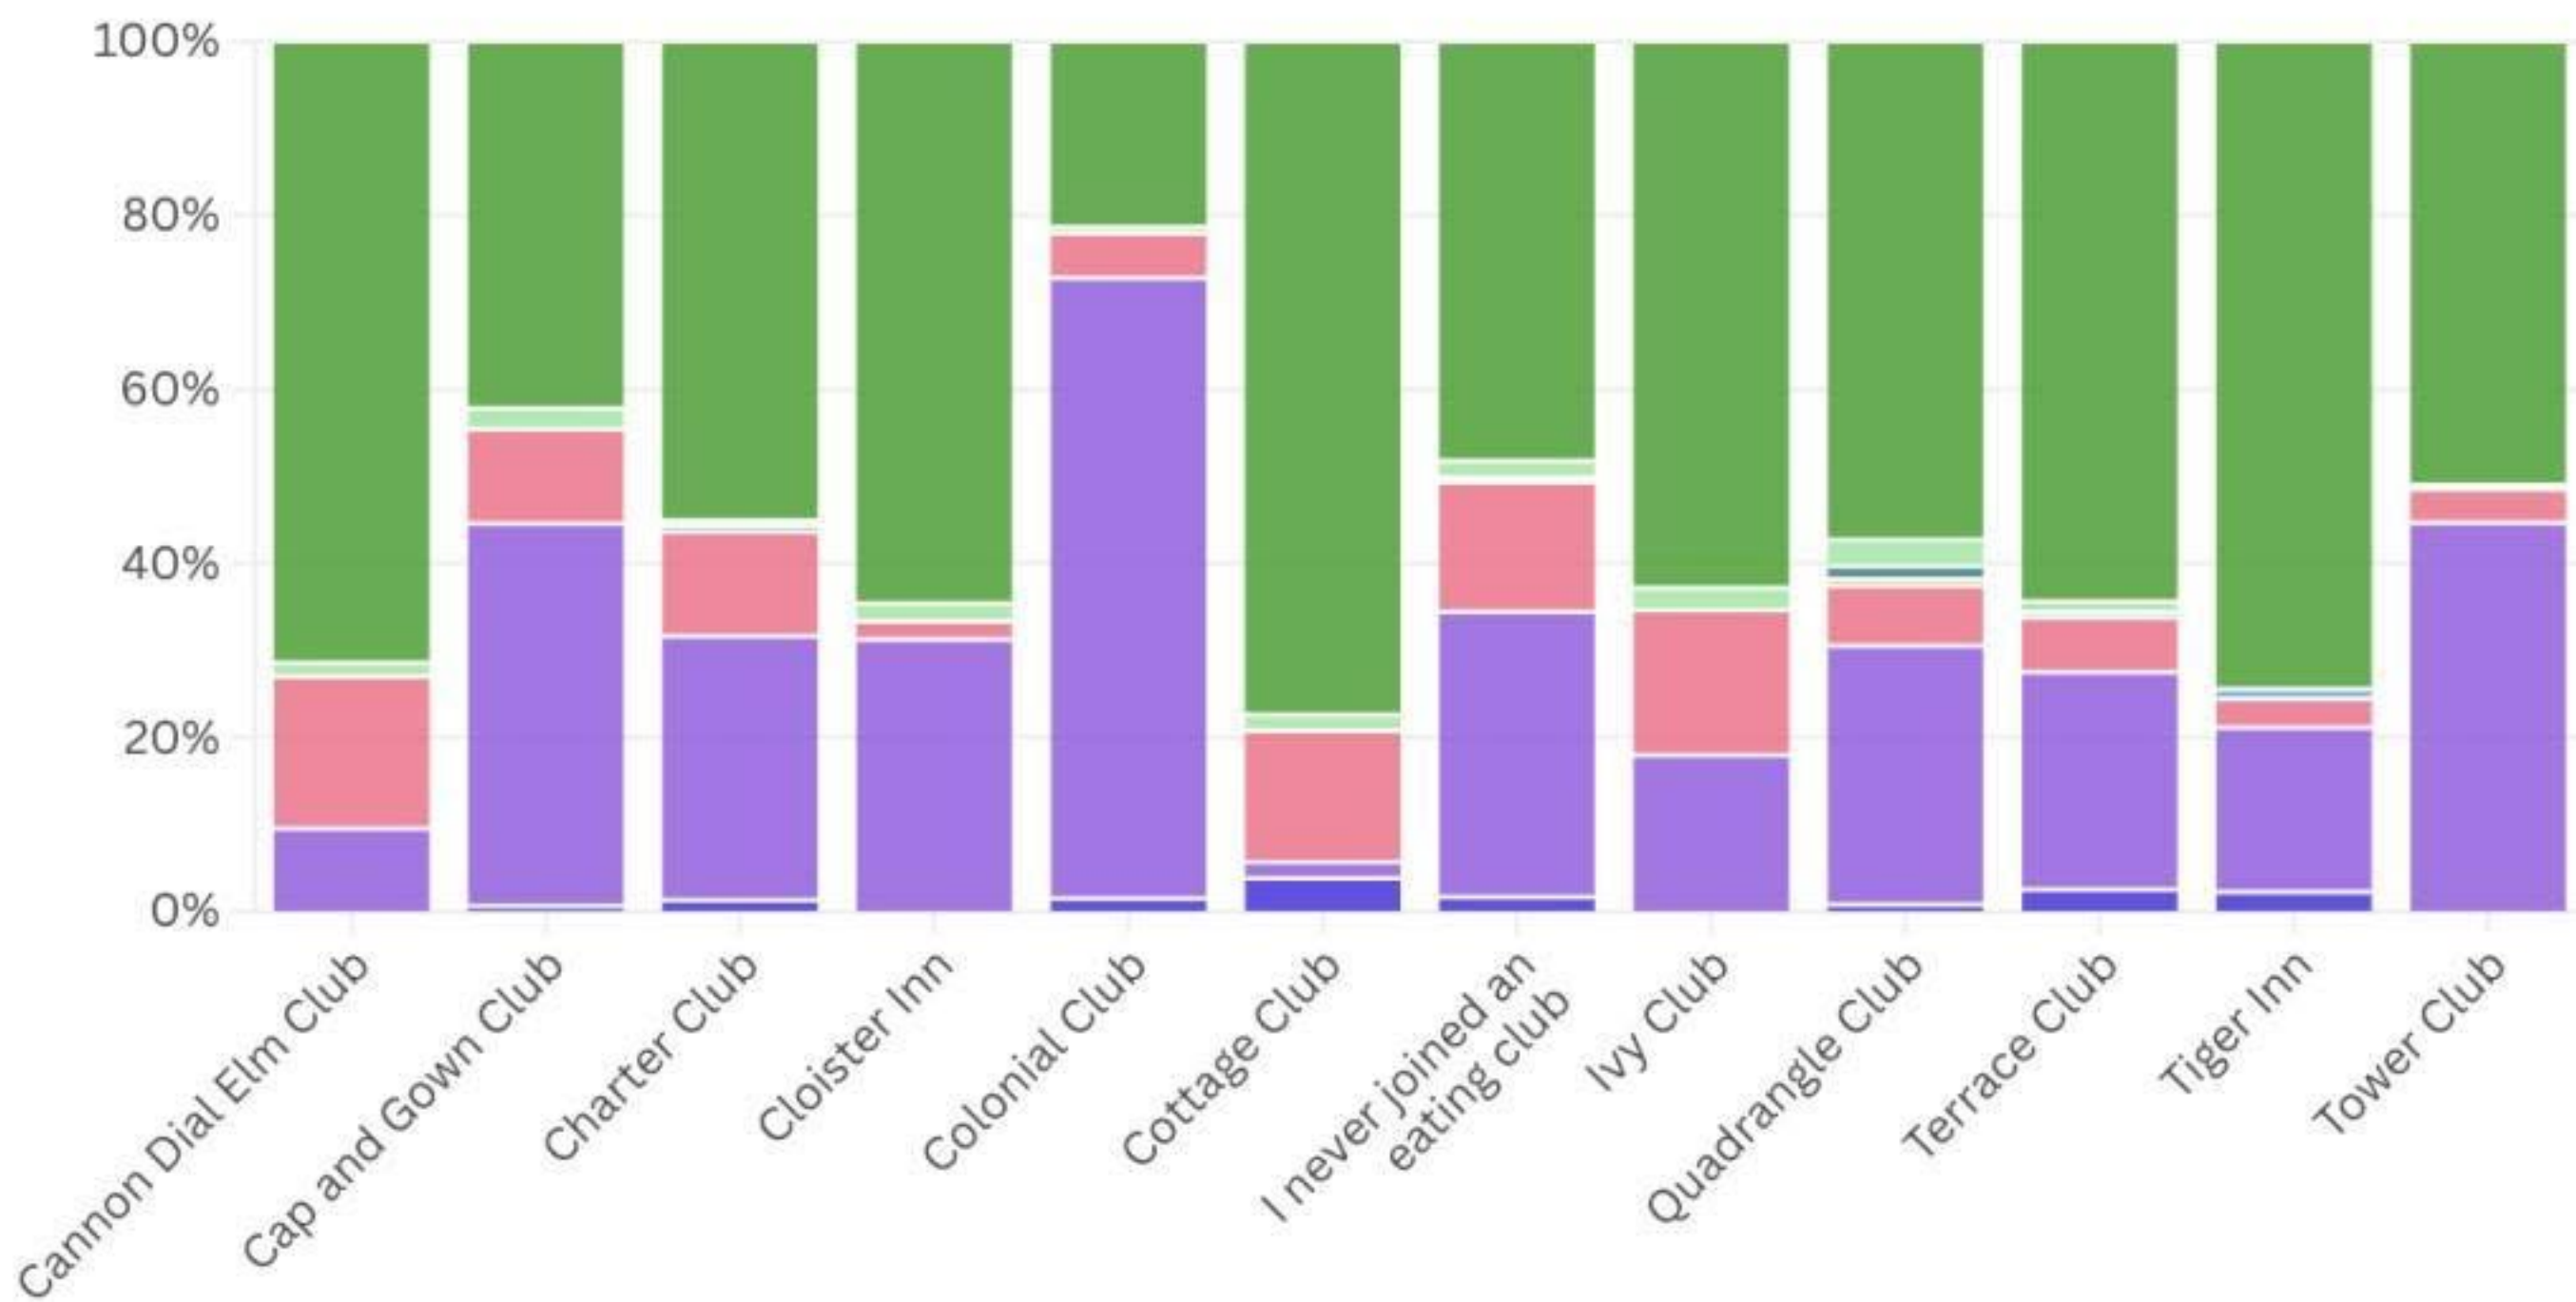

Source: Senior 2022, 2023, and 2024 Surveys • This formula calculates the average drinking frequency in a club by assigning numerical weights to response categories (from "Never" = 0 to "Daily" = 7) and weighting them by the number of respondents for each club. The result represents a weighted average frequency, providing a single value that reflects overall drinking habits in each club.

Caption: All eleven eating clubs on Prospect Ave are known for their distinctive communities. As sophomores find a fit for their final two years on campus, they must weigh the different aspects of each club that give them their identity. With bicker season concluded and hundreds of sophomores settling into their new clubs, The Daily Princetonian broke down the senior respondents aggregated from the 2022, 2023, and 2024 senior surveys, looking at the most interesting trends on the Street.
