Princeton University Health Services opens doors in new Frist Health Center

“McCosh Health Center was built in 1925 at a time when healthcare delivery systems were entirely different than those of today, and Princeton had many fewer students.”

“Frist Health Center is larger, but is also redesigned to support efficient and effective healthcare delivery.”

Janet Finnie '84

UHS Director

“I went inside yesterday, and it was really modern and pretty.”

“It doesn’t really fit the aesthetic of the rest of the college, but it’s pretty nice inside.”

Ladan Abdullahi ’28

When discussing the improvements made for FHC, Finnie remarked that the new building is equipped with “private rooms and bathrooms for overnight patients in the infirmary, a striking student lounge, a yoga/meditation contemplative space, a new multipurpose room that will be a shared resource for campus partners, and more.”
